List some of the more famous Roman Catholic Hebrew and/or Greek Bible scholars.

Here are some notable Roman Catholic scholars known for their expertise in Hebrew and/or Greek biblical studies. I've focused on a mix of historical and modern figures who have made significant contributions to interpreting the Bible in its original languages. This is not an exhaustive list, but highlights some of the more famous ones:

- St. Jerome (c. 347–420): A Doctor of the Church and priest who translated the Bible into Latin (the Vulgate). He was proficient in both Hebrew and Greek, studying Hebrew extensively in the desert with Jewish tutors to ensure accurate Old Testament renderings.
- Hugh of St. Victor (c. 1096–1141): A theologian and canon regular who learned Hebrew from Jewish scholars and consulted them on prophetic texts. He emphasized literal interpretations over the Vulgate, drawing on Hebrew exegesis from figures like Rashi.
- Andrew of St. Victor (d. 1175): An English theologian who produced commentaries on the Pentateuch and other Old Testament books, relying on Hebrew sources like Rashi and Joseph Bekhor Shor for literal-historical exegesis.
- Nicholas de Lyre (c. 1. Continue conversation ciscan scholar whose "Postillae" commentaries on the entire Bible incorporated Hebrew
